Uber Eats and the Gauteng Department of Economic Development have officially celebrated a landmark partnership that has generated over R1 billion in economic value for township merchants and delivery people. The collaboration, established through a Memorandum of Understanding signed in May 2023, was designed to support the implementation of the Township Development

Act by bringing township-based enterprises into the digital economy. This strategic move has successfully translated policy intent into measurable economic participation across

Gauteng's township sectors. The initiative has exceeded its original ambitions by connecting local entrepreneurs to millions of new customers across the province. Source: moneyweb.co.za

The Department of Social Development (DSD) is aiming to submit its revised policy for basic income support to cabinet by March 2027. The department briefed parliament's Portfolio Committee for Social Development on its second-quarter performance for the 2025/26 financial year on Wednesday, and gave an update on progress made in developing a universal basic income support (BIS) policy. The DSD first tabled a draft BIS policy before cabinet in November 2024, but cabinet sent it back for further work. Source: moneyweb.co.za

Strip out inflation, and the brutal truth is that you're taking home 47% less money than a decade ago. This is according to an index by debt management company DebtBusters that aims to determine the level of consumer stress in South Africa. In other words, while 2025 felt like a recovery, this is only a marginal breather after a period in which taxes spiked, salaries hardly shifted and grocery prices soared. Salaries just aren't measuring up, says DebtBusters COO Benay Sager. While net incomes inched up 2% over the past decade, inflation has grown 49% in that time – leading to a stark discrepancy.
